SHORT DESCRIPTION

International Migration is one of the most relevant issues in our contemporary societies. The foreign-born population has incorporated into the modern societies becoming one of their most significant social groups, creating new social and cultural diversity has to be properly managed and integrated.

The course will focus on international migration trying to understand the causes that created those flows, the process of incorporation of this new population into the host societies, and finally the effects and consequences -economic, political, social, and cultural- of this integration.

Throughout the course, students will approach the international migration process and the social situation of migrants in the receiving societies mainly through documentaries, testimonies, readings, debates, and class lectures.

Students will take active participation in this course, developing their own critical thinking about the subject.

There are no specific requirements to follow this course, except a personal interest in the subject.
